FORT TICONDEROGA
AMERICA'S FORT™

One of the biggest frustrations for historians researching women at military sites like Fort Ticonderoga is the lack of a written record of women. Most documents from the period are written by men, and documents pertaining to military sites are usually related to the functions of the army. Orderly books are a perfect example of this. An orderly book contains the daily orders given by a particular officer to his command. Orderly books are one of the most useful sources of information on the day to day lives of soldiers, and the activities of the army.

In 1776, Colonel Anthony Wayne's Orderly Book provides a day to day account of the Continental Army at Fort Ticonderoga in 1776 from July 10th-December 31st . During this time, Ticonderoga is a major supply depot of the Northern Department of the Continental Army, and is full of activity. Of over more than 100 entries, only four mention women. However, important information on women at Fort Ticonderoga in 1776 can be gleaned from these entries if we analyze them well.

After having students read through these entries, you can use the questions on the following page to guide your students, or have them brainstorm on their own to mine information from these accounts.

It's also important to look at what information is lacking on these accounts. Ask you students what information is still missing from these accounts. Are there other primary sources that might have this information? The written sources we have from the 18th century contain only what people decided to write down, and preserve. Are there reasons that this information wasn't recorded in written history?

Parole: Henry Counter Sign: Carrol

Maurading is become so frequent, that the Genl. expects every officer will in a spirit'd manner exert himself to prevent it, and bring the perpetrators to exemplary punishment, last night a poor inhabitant was rob'd of all himself and his distress'd family, had to subsist on, or depend on this winter. Certain villians who said they belong'd to the Jersey Regt., there are more villians that wear blue than is suspected in the Jersey Regt., the Gcnl. recommends it to the commanding officer of the 4 Brigade to endeavour by every means in his power to discover and bring to justice all persons suspected of pilfering and maurauding. This army is paid to protect & not to pilfer the inhabitants. The Col. of the Regt. of Militia are forthwith to bring in their demands for mileage and billeting that they may be discharged forthwit without delay.
